Q: xpages client side script error while using spinner control I have the following code that has been working for several years now, but all of a sudden it does not work anymore. What am I doing wrong? Error message: A: showValue="true" must come first in the rendered attribute. See the spec. Q: Tool/App to compare physical/geometrical formula and "computer" formula I'm searching for a tool or application which can compare a formula (like $x = k\sqrt{a+bx}$) to a computational formula (like $x = \sqrt{a+bx}$ or $x = \sqrt{a+bx+c}$). The application must be able to do some simple math (e.g. one or both of the numbers are not zero), but maybe it's no problem for the tool to throw out all equations that are not supposed to be compared. The best would be an application which is able to visually mark incorrect parts of a formula (no display math, just fractions, *, etc.), but I'm not sure if there is one (I didn't find something like that in most Computer Algebra suites). I think, this is the best (if not only) way to get someone else to double check my solutions. A: Use the myMathSolver. Rafael Cruz Says ACA Makes America a Socialist Country This

What's New In?

Passengers infected with SARS-CoV-2 face the very real risk of life-threatening respiratory complications if they contract the coronavirus in the coming months. Although the bulk of the global burden may be contained in China, the outbreak has spread widely and will threaten people around the world, including in the United States. Fortunately, medical treatments are just a few years away. One of the newest ideas to combat the virus, including therapies, vaccines, and preventive measures, targets a protein that helps coronaviruses get into cells, then replicate and multiply. The protein, called spike protein, is part of a corona virus's crown-like structure called a coronavirus spike, which attaches to a cell's surface receptor proteins and helps invade the cell. The spike protein is the main subject of a new study in ACS's journal Nano Letters. It's not only a potential target for treatment of coronavirus; researchers speculate that the protein's diverse functions in other viruses, such as influenza, could lead to drugs that target the spike protein of other viruses. The study also suggests how drugs might affect a spike protein–coated virus. First, the researchers tested silver ions at different concentrations and found that the spike protein can be degraded by silver ions in a dose-dependent manner. Importantly, the agents had no ill effects on the spike protein. (In a related study, other researchers used nanoparticles to inhibit spikes and thus prevent infection.) When the team tested the silver-ion-treated spike proteins, the team observed specific and dose-dependent inhibition of spike's functions in two coronavirus strains and in two other viruses of the same family. Most importantly, the study suggests a prevention route for coronavirus infection: A coating of silver ions can block the spike protein from binding to its surface receptor, and thus stop the virus from invading cells. So what's the catch? The researchers tested their agents in a lab setting, but a spike protein–coated virus in a human would have to go through the body's natural defenses. That would include white blood cells that could identify and eliminate the protein-coated virus. Still, the research shows that silver ions alone are enough to degrade the spike protein and thus prevent infection. The team's next challenge is to apply the findings to treatment and to check whether they show the same results. If the treatments prove effective, then
