The Episcopal Church has drawn more than 800 applications for priests and deacons, a 23 percent increase over last year. David Paulson The Episcopal Church has drawn more than 800 applications for priests and deacons, a 23 percent increase over last year. David Paulson The Episcopal Church is moving forward with plans to ordain women to the priesthood and to deacon, though not to bishop. It was a small, but significant, decision by a panel of scholars and theologians at a meeting here July 30 to approve a recommendation on the issue by the General Convention that is widely expected to be approved at the meeting in St. Louis later this month. The recommendations, to be added to a report to the year's General Convention, are nothing more than guidelines. But the vote, held in secret over two days, was significant because it represented the first time the bishops' church has ever endorsed full ordination for women and deacons. The move also marked another step forward by the church in its recently refocused push to reach out to gays and lesbians. The Church had traditionally withheld ordination of women and deacons because of doubts about them being married in church ceremonies. But, in its general policy statements, the church's governing body has stated
