Yet on Tuesday, the travel giant joined a list of companies that apparently think employee relations are a good idea only if they're capable of being imposed in the name of public safety. In a staff memo sent to employees on Tuesday, and obtained by the CBC, Air Canada warns that it's closing its Edmonton, London and Pearson maintenance operations temporarily, while its maintenance roles at London's Billy Bishop Airport and Air Canada's home base in Calgary are being reassigned to other aircraft. The memo, signed by CEO Calin Rovinescu, was emailed to employees and appears on Air Canada's intranet. And like most of the memos you'd expect from an airline, there was no explanation of the action. The London operation is its home base and the air hub for Air Canada's Boeing 767 service to North America, as well as its Boeing 747-400 aircraft that carry more than half of the airline's passengers. In the memo, Rovinescu offers no explanation for the layoffs, but advises employees that their wages and benefits are not affected. "We are taking this step to ensure all Air Canada employees are safe," he writes. "We are taking this step to ensure all Air Canada employees are safe." - Calin Rovinescu, CEO of Air Canada He's been up front about the issue before. In an interview last November, he told the CBC that Air Canada was "using a tremendous amount of caution, but we have to be flexible to ensure there's a safety net." "We have to be flexible. We have to look after our employees, but there is not a single day that we don't have our primary responsibility to our customers." Airlines are increasingly using such moves to keep operations going while under public scrutiny, often when passenger travel isn't, as well as when cargo traffic is affected. Amid widespread cancellations of flights in the
