Q: When referencing an environment variable in a Groovy script, what does the colon represent? According to this documentation: A colon character (:) tells Groovy to use the value in the environment variable. How do you know what it is saying here? Is this part of the Groovy scripting language itself, or part of the underlying JVM? If part of the JVM, does this apply to other languages or just Groovy? A: It is Groovy part. The syntax is valid for other scripting languages as well. source Time-of-flight (TOF) and phase-measuring devices (PMD) are methods of measuring distance in some form of interaction with a target object with a distance-measuring apparatus. In a time-of-flight method, the distance is determined based on a time difference between a generation of a signal and a detection of a reflection of the signal off a target object. In a phase-measuring method, the distance is determined based on a change in phase of a detection signal in accordance with the distance to the target object. A distance-measuring method using light as a signal has the following advantage over a method using acoustic waves: because light transmission can occur regardless of an object's properties, such as water, as well as light reflection, a contrast ratio is high and a measurable range is large. As a result, the light method is commonly used in an underwater environment. Another advantage of the light method is that the light can be more precisely measured because an image can be acquired and a distance to a target object can be confirmed without moving the measuring apparatus, as in the case of an ultrasonic method. Thus, the light method, which uses light as a transmission/reflection signal, is widely used in a variety of applications. The light may be directed onto a target object and be reflected or not, at which point the reflected light may be received by a light receiving element and converted into an electric signal. The light receiving element may then be converted into a voltage signal, and a difference between this voltage signal and a reference voltage signal may be calculated. Particularly, in a TOF light distance measuring method, the difference between these voltage signals may be obtained over a certain period of time, such as a period of light irradiation and an interval that has elapsed after light irradiation. This provides a time difference between the time of light irradiation and
